

This is something that we have all been waiting for. For the FCC to consider amending the rules is the best decision at this point. The electronic dialing is disturbing in every household and needs to be put to a stop. Telephone subscribers who do not wish to have calls placed to their phones by telemarketers should be able to put their name on a generalized list. I understand that the commission implemented company-specific do-not-call lists, but is this really going to be enough. This seems to be more of a hassle than thought to be at first. If you could just mark your name down once and be done with it then I think it would be worth it, but trying to write your name on specific company do-not-call lists is too much. Once you get one company out of the way then you have another calling you.

I understand that what is being done at the moment is the best possible. Having this implemented will be the best thing yet for many households. Sending out information to households will be one way of letting people know more about this. Another thing is that when you sign up for telephone activation you should be able to sign your name right there to be on the do-not-call lists available. The people need to know about this opportunity otherwise they won't use it.
